

To have flowers and chocolates arrive together abroad, arrange both through one supplier in the recipient's country and confirm that they will travel in the same delivery. Give the supplier a complete address, a contact number and a delivery date that works for the recipient.

Start with one local supplier

Look for a florist in the destination country that also offers chocolates. Ordering both items in one transaction gives you a single point of contact if anything needs to change. Before paying, check that the flowers and chocolates are part of the same delivery, rather than separate shipments.

Ask what happens if the pictured flowers or chocolates are unavailable. A supplier may need to substitute an item, so say which details matter most to you, such as the flower colours or the type of chocolate.

Check the delivery details

Dates and cutoffs depend on the supplier and location. Time zone differences can also make an order placed in the evening at home arrive after the supplier's ordering deadline. Check the local date and time before choosing a delivery day.

Use the address format requested by the supplier, including any building name, apartment number and local postal code. Add the recipient's phone number if requested, and check that the recipient will be available or that someone else can accept the gift.

Place the order carefully

1. Choose a florist that delivers to the recipient's address and offers both flowers and chocolates.
2. Confirm that the items will arrive together and ask about substitutions.
3. Enter the address and phone number, then check them against the recipient's details.
4. Select a delivery date and include a short card message.
5. Save the confirmation and contact the supplier if the details are wrong.

If the occasion falls on a busy date, order early and consider an earlier delivery day. This gives the supplier more time to prepare the gift and leaves room to resolve a problem.

Think about the chocolates

Warm weather can affect chocolate during transport or while a parcel waits outside. Ask how it will be packed and delivered, particularly if the destination is hot. A delivery that can be handed directly to someone may be preferable to one left at the door.

Check the chocolate selection for ingredients the recipient avoids. If you are unsure about an allergy, ask the supplier for ingredient information before ordering. Do not assume that a chocolate assortment is free from nuts, dairy or other allergens.

Questions you may have

Can I send chocolates from my own country instead?

You may be able to, but international food shipments can be subject to import rules and delays. Ordering locally is often simpler if both gifts need to arrive together.

Can I request a precise delivery time?

Ask the supplier before ordering. Some offer time windows, but a specific hour may not be available.

What if the recipient is not home?

Check the supplier's policy in advance. It may contact the recipient, leave the gift with someone else or arrange another delivery.
