

Chrysanthemums, especially white and yellow ones, are traditionally offered on Qingming Festival to remember and honor the dead. Other simple flowers may also be used, depending on family custom and the preferences of the person being remembered.

Why chrysanthemums are offered

Qingming, also known as Tomb Sweeping Day, is a time when many families visit ancestral graves. They may clean the resting place, pay their respects and leave offerings. Flowers can be part of that visit, alongside other offerings chosen by the family.

Chrysanthemums are closely associated with mourning and remembrance in Chinese culture. Their connection to the occasion makes them a familiar choice for a grave or memorial. A simple bunch can express care without needing elaborate decoration.

Practices vary across regions and families, so there is no single arrangement that everyone must bring. Some families have established customs, while others choose flowers according to what is available or what feels meaningful.

Colors and other flower choices

White chrysanthemums are a common choice for mourning. Yellow chrysanthemums are also traditionally used and can be placed on their own or combined with white flowers.

White lilies and other pale flowers may be included in a tribute. The choice need not be limited to chrysanthemums, particularly if the person being remembered loved a different flower. A favorite bloom can make the offering feel personal while still keeping the arrangement quiet and respectful.

If you are joining someone else's family visit, ask about their preferences before buying flowers. Color and flower meanings can differ between families, and a brief question is more useful than assuming that every custom is the same.

How to prepare a flower offering

Fresh flowers do not need much dressing for a graveside visit. Choose an arrangement that is easy to carry and place, and check any rules at the cemetery or memorial site.

1. Choose a small bunch of white or yellow chrysanthemums, or another flower your family considers appropriate.
2. Remove unnecessary wrapping before placing the flowers, if the site asks visitors to do so.
3. Set the flowers where the cemetery permits them, taking care not to disturb nearby graves.
4. Follow your family's lead during the visit, and take away any packaging or other waste.

If fresh flowers are not practical, ask the family or cemetery what alternatives are welcome. Local rules may limit what can be left at a grave and how long it may remain there.

Questions about Qingming flowers

Are white chrysanthemums the only traditional choice?

No. Yellow chrysanthemums are also common, and some families choose other flowers. Personal and local customs matter as much as any general guidance.

Can I bring the deceased person's favorite flowers?

Yes, if that feels appropriate to the family. A favorite flower can be a small, specific reminder of the person being honored.

Should the flowers be arranged in a particular way?

There is no single arrangement required for every family. A modest bunch is suitable in many settings, though it is worth checking family preferences and cemetery rules.

More on this: local flower delivery in Europe