Thirty years is a long time to spend on Cardiff's rooftops, and John Owen has spent all of them learning how the city's houses cope with the wind and rain that roll in off the Bristol Channel. Redland Roofing Cardiff is the family-owned business he runs from Trecinon Road in Rumney, and for many households across the capital it has become the first name they ring when a slate slips or a ceiling starts to stain. If you want roofers in Cardiff who have been around long enough to have seen almost every kind of roof problem, this is a little of their story. Before it became Redland Roofing Cardiff, the business traded for more than twenty years as Redland Property Services. That long stretch built the reputation the company still relies on today. It has always been independent and family-owned, so you deal directly with the people who will actually do the work. Customers on Google talk about "John" and "John and his team" by name, which roofers cardiff says a lot about how the business runs. You speak to the owner, you get his honest opinion of your https://lanejjcx554.slatecurrent.com/posts/cyncoed-and-lakeside-roofing-contractor-redland-roofing-cardiff roof, and the price he quotes is the price you pay. Rumney is home, but the work reaches right across the city. It's a short drive along Newport Road into Roath, where Victorian terraces with Welsh slate roofs and tired chimney stacks line the streets off Albany Road and City Road. Carry on and you reach Cathays, full of student lets and landlord properties close to Cardiff University, and then the city centre itself, with its older townhouses around Queen Street and Cathays Park. The team also works in Penylan, Splott, Heath and Llanishen, down to Butetown and Cardiff Bay, and west into Canton, Pontcanna and Llandaff. Different streets mean different roofs, and three decades in the trade means very little comes as a surprise.
