

What Nebraska Employers Should Know About Wage and Hour Law Nebraska employers answer to two sets of wage rules at the same time, the federal Fair Labor Standards Act and Nebraska's own wage statutes, and where they differ, an employer generally has to meet whichever standard is more generous to the worker. The essentials are paying at least the applicable Click for info minimum wage, paying overtime correctly, classifying workers properly, and paying wages on time, including final paychecks. Minimum wage has been a moving target. Voters approved a series of increases in 2022, and in 2026 the Legislature passed LB 258, signed February 9, 2026, changing Nebraska's minimum wage rules again. Employers from restaurants in the Old Market to retailers near Westroads should confirm which rate applies to which workers and update pay practices and workplace posters accordingly. The state wage and hour act generally covers employers with four or more employees, while the federal law has its own coverage tests, so even small businesses should check where they stand. Overtime causes more trouble than almost any other issue. Under federal law, nonexempt employees must receive time and a half for hours over 40 in a workweek, and exempt status depends on both salary and actual job duties, not job titles. Calling someone a manager or paying a salary does not by itself make that person exempt. Treating workers as independent contractors when they function as employees creates similar exposure, especially in trucking and logistics, construction, and other industries common around Omaha. Off-the-clock work, unpaid training time, and time rounding practices are other frequent sources of claims.
