Walk down almost any street between City Road and Cardiff University and look up. You'll see long runs of Victorian terraces topped with Welsh slate, party-wall chimneys shared between neighbours, and here and there a slate that has slipped out of line. Many of these roofs are well over a century old, and keeping them watertight is everyday work for Redland Roofing Cardiff. As family-run roofers in Cardiff with over 30 years in the trade, John and his team know these streets and the way these roofs behave. Welsh slate is a superb roofing material and can last for generations, but the nails that hold it are another story. Over time the original fixings corrode, and slates start to slide down the roof one by one. A single slipped slate might not look like much from the pavement, yet it leaves a gap where rain can reach the battens and felt beneath. Left alone through a Cardiff winter, that gap can turn into a damp patch on a bedroom ceiling. A common fix is to secure a replacement slate with a metal clip, or to refix a whole section where several have moved. Where a roof has lost too many slates, John will tell you honestly whether repairs still make sense or whether a bigger job is due. Chimneys add another layer. In Cathays, stacks often sit on the party wall, so the chimney is shared with next door. Cracked mortar, loose pots and failing lead flashings around the base are all common, and the south-westerly gales that come up the Severn Estuary find every weakness. Redland Roofing Cardiff handles chimney repair and repointing, new lead work, and full chimney removal where a stack is redundant. With a roof inspection Cardiff shared stack, the team will explain what the work means for next door before anything starts. Valley gutters and the small lean-to roofs over rear kitchens get checked too, because that's often where a leak really begins.
